HAIRS

Did you know that the average human scalp has between 80 and 100 thousand individual hairs and that we lose about 100 hairs per day which are then replaced by others. Of course, your individual hair count may vary, but the Lord knows exactly how many each one of us has - Luke 12:7 - “Even the very hairs of your head are all numbered, so do not be afraid.”

But did you also know that a forensic examination of hair can tell if it is from a human or from an animal and even what kind of animal. And the DNA extracted from the hair sample can identify even more about the individual.

Genesis 1 tells us that God created all the animals according to their 'kinds' - a 'kind' being similar animals who can interbreed, even if there are variations in the appearance of those animals. This means that there should be distinct differences between 'kinds' of animals - both on the large visible scale and on the smaller microscale. Even differences in the hair or fur of the different kinds of animals as well as between animals and humans who were uniquely created in the image of God. A forensic examination can quickly tell which 'kind' of animal the hair or fur came from.

The patterns seen in the hairs or the continuous or fragmented parts of the patterns identifies the creature from which it came. For example: the hair of a cat under the microscope will appear to resemble a stack of dinner plates. The hair of a dog looks like small blocks stuck together. The hair from the horse kind looks like a mosaic pattern. The hair of a deer has a fur pattern that looks like reptile scales. The hair of primates is different from the hair of humans - which would be expected as we were created in God's unique image.

While evolutionists claim that since animals and humans came from a common ancestry who was covered with hair, the hairs should all be the same or at least similar - but the truth shows great differences not only in the appearance, but also in the function.
